Why are you running for City Council:

When I turned 40, I started thinking about how I contribute to the community, and what more I could do in service to a better Brandon. I started volunteering, showing up to support local events, and looking for ways to help. I've been fortunate to work closely with council through the museum; I know the impact that the position can have on our city. When nominations opened, I realized how important it was to me that my morals and priorities, and my neighbours', were represented.

I love living in Ward 9. When we first moved into our home, we were immediately welcomed by several neighbours. Friendships like that are a gift and a responsibility, I put a lot of value in gestures like that. It is that neighbourly love and support that I intend to bring to city council.

I believe that the best investment a city can make is in its people, and with some people, you have to meet them where they are, while keeping the future in mind. That's why I cherish the moments in my job when I get to go out to different communities and organizations to speak and engage with people who I would otherwise not have met, to discover what I can give, what I can learn, and where we might arrive together.
